FOREWORD

The compiler of this little book finds a very special satisfaction in the fact that he is giving to the public a thing the lack of which he has personally felt keenly for the more than thirty years of his sojourn in "The Land of Sinim". Of making of dictionaries there is no end, and there are already many pocket dictionaries upon the market; but the compiler of this latest of them all has never found one specially adapted to be the pocket companion, from his first day to his last, of the foreigner who comes to China, either for business or for missions; furnishing on the instant 99-100 of all the information he requires as to Chinese printed or written characters, or speech, for every day use. The vocabularies have always been too large or too small, the translations too few or to many, the common combinations too numerous or lacking altogether, the information given as to the composition of characters and as to their relative frequency too meager, or hidden in out-of-the-way places. The compiler of the book now before you believes that he has fairly overcome all these difficulties, and that all students and speakers of Chinese, except those wishing to acquire a strictly technical vocabulary in certain professional lines and those planning profound study of Chinese classical literature, will find in this little book all the requisites for ordinary conversation and reading.

The book was primarily intended as an Index to the Five Thousand Character Cards prepared by the compiler for the Yenching School of Chinese Studies, for the use of its own students and any others who may feel the need of this great auxiliary to language study. After selecting and preparing for the press these 5000 character cards, with their abundance of convenient information as to the characters earliest met and most frequently used in the Chinese language, the compiler began on an Index. But why not make this a supplement, as well as a complement, to the Character Cards? The individual characters are not the thing which the student most frequently desires to use in speech and in ordinary reading. The Chinese may be a monosyllabic language, but Chinese speech is largely dissyllabic, and the clustering of the most common combinations of characters in connection with them adds many fold to the usefulness of an Index. Therefore this Index, without adding greatly to its bulk, has become a most convenient pocket Dictionary. The cutting out of the second 5000 infrequently used characters found in most pocket dictionaries makes room for these useful combinations and saves many a long search.

The first column on each page gives, of course, the characters, with the various forms in which they may be encountered, also the Peking tone of each. The arrangement of the whole is that of the Wade Romanization, not because it is ideal, but simply because its recognition is most nearly universal. The second column gives the Radical, the third, the Phonetic, with its number in Soothill's Dictionary. The fourth column gives the usual translations, common combinations, and indications as to whether the character when thus read is colloquial (俗) or literary (文), and whether it is used as a "Classifier", or "Numerator" (C), or as a Surname (S). The fifth column gives other readings of the same character, under which further information may be sought. The sixth column indicates the group to which the character has been assigned in reference to the earliness of its occurrence in the Lessons of the Language School. The School's Character Cards are arranged in ten groups of 500 each, lettered from A to K. Groups A and B differ slightly from the others in that they include a few characters which would not occur in a list of the 1000 most frequently used characters, but which do occur in the Language School Lessons of the first year. Group P includes the Phonetics which are not used as characters.

Unless unconscious omissions have been made, this Dictionary Index includes all characters which occur in any of the Language School Lessons, Baller's Primer, Mateer's Mandarin Lessons, Kuan Hua Chih Nan, The Old and New Testaments, and the Blodget-Goodrich Hymnal.

A Radical Index and List of Radicals will be found at the end of the book, which is sent forth in the hope that, with others as well as the compiler, it may "meet a long-felt want".
